EDITOR'S NOTE

This edition of the Florida A&M University (FAMU) Law Review is comprised of various topics written by legal professionals as well as student-written comments. Each article was chosen to showcase different areas of law with thought-provoking suggestions on how the law can better serve certain classes of individuals. While each article boasts a differing theme, these articles identify a current area of law, and further proceed to challenge those who make and enforce the law to make modifications.

On behalf of the FAMU Law Review staff, the FAMU College of Law faculty and the administration, I thank each author for granting us the opportunity to share your perspectives and insight. In preparation of publication of these thought-provoking viewpoints, there are additional individuals that contributed to the success of the year of our editors of whom I would be remiss if I did not thank. I also would like to thank each member of the FAMU Law Review senior and junior staff whose hard work, dedication, and time has not gone unnoticed. Every effort that you have put in has been recognized, and your hard work has enabled this edition to be published. In addition, I would also like to recognize the Editorial Board, each of whom has worked hard during every step of the process to get this edition published.

I would finally like to thank a special person who has made the last year of our lives a little easier. With all of the challenges that the editors may have faced during each step of the process, we could not have completed this issue without the help of one of our resource librarians, Paul McLaughlin. With the patience and knowledge you have shown towards each of our editors and members of the student body, we could not say thank you enough.
